Difficult or Traumatic Events

IT'S OK
NOT TO BE OK

Feeling overwhelmed
and struggling to cope?

Everyone reacts differently to tough or traumatic experiences. Seeing or hearing about conflict or violence can be really upsetting, and for some, it can be pretty overwhelming.

After something really upsetting happens, you might experience:

- Bad dreams, flashbacks, or thoughts you can't shake.
- Strong emotions like worry, fear, anger, guilt, or shame.
- Negative thoughts about yourself or others, like blaming yourself.
- Acting differently, maybe avoiding going out or not enjoying things you used to.
- Changes in how you connect with others, like feeling distant or on guard.

Sometimes, these feelings can lead to mental health issues like anxiety, or depression—but remember, help is always out there if you need it.

Ways to start feeling better

Give yourself time...

- Overcoming these thoughts and feelings can take time, so don't put yourself under too much pressure to feel better straight away.

Talk about it...

- Talking to someone you trust about what happened and how you're feeling can be a big relief. It might even help them too if they're going through something similar.

Lean on your support around you...

- Friends, family, or anyone you trust can help you feel better. Being around people who care about you can make a big difference
- They can offer emotional support, help with practical tasks or just spending time doing normal things - all help improve our mood.

Stick to your routine...

- Keep doing your usual activities, even if it feels tough. It can help bring some normality back into your life.

Take care of yourself

- Eating well, staying active, and getting enough sleep are all part of self-care and are essential to mental health and wellbeing.

When to get help

Everyone heals differently, and many people recover with support from those around them. But if you notice that you or someone you know isn't getting better, here are some signs that more help might be needed:

Feeling the same or worse over time?

If you've been feeling really bad for more than a few weeks and it's not getting better, it might be time to reach out for help.

Feeling down all the time?

If you're feeling sad or anxious most days, or if you're having trouble sleeping or thinking clearly, it's okay to ask for help.

Lost interest in things?

If you're not into the things you usually enjoy, consider reaching out for support.

Feeling overwhelmed?

If you ever feel like you just can't handle things, it's important to get some help.

How can you help someone?

If you're worried about someone, here's how you can support them:

Be there – offer to spend time and let them know you're there for them, even if they're not ready to talk.

Listen – if they do want to talk, just listen. You don't have to give advice—just being there and hearing them out can mean a lot.

Ask how you can help – ask if they need help finding extra support or with practical things like chores or running errands.

Ask the hard questions - if you're really worried, don't be afraid to ask if they're self-harming or thinking about suicide.

It's important to know so you can help them get the right support.
